in this revised and expanded second edition of Third World Studies Gary Y. Okihiro considers the methods and theories that might constitute the formation of third world studies proposed in 1968 at San Francisco State College by the Third World Liberation Front but replaced by faculty and administrators with ethnic studies. Third world studies was over before it began as opposed to ethnic studies which Okihiro critiques for its liberalism and US centrism. Third world studies begins with the colonized world and the anti-imperial, anticolonial and antiracist projects located therein as described by W. E. B. Du Bois in 1900. Third world studies analyzes the locations and articulations of power around the axes of race, gender, sexuality, disability, class and nation. In this new edition Okihiro emphasizes the work of third world intellectuals such as M. N. Roy, José Martí, and Oliver Cromwell Cox. Foregrounds the importance of Bandung and the tricontinental and adds discussions of eugenics, feminist epistemologies and religion. With this work Okihiro establishes third world studies as a theoretical formation and a liberatory practice.

Understanding the Peters Projection: A Detailed Explanation

The Peters Projection, also known as the Gall-Peters projection, is a cylindrical map projection that presents a true depiction of the relative areas of landmasses. Unlike many other commonly used map projections, such as the Mercator projection, it avoids the significant distortions in size and shape that occur, particularly at higher latitudes. This article will delve into the definition, characteristics, creation, criticisms, and applications of the Peters projection.

I. Defining the Peters Projection: A Cylindrical Equal-Area Projection

The Peters Projection is a type of cylindrical equal-area map projection. This means it projects the Earth's surface onto a cylinder tangent to the equator. The key characteristic, and the reason for its creation, is its accurate representation of the relative areas of countries and continents. In simpler terms, a country's size on a Peters projection map is proportional to its actual size on the Earth's surface. This stands in stark contrast to many other commonly used projections that distort area significantly. For instance, while Greenland appears roughly the same size as Africa on a Mercator projection, on a Peters projection, Africa is shown to be its considerably larger true size.

II. Construction and Mathematical Basis: Maintaining Equal Area

The construction of the Peters projection relies on a simple geometric principle: maintaining equal area across the entire map. This is achieved by stretching the meridians (lines of longitude) equally, and compressing the parallels (lines of latitude) proportionally to maintain the correct area relationships. The mathematical formula underpinning the projection is relatively straightforward, making it computationally less complex than some other projections. This simplicity contributes to its ease of use in cartographic applications.

III. Strengths and Advantages of the Peters Projection: Accurate Area Representation

The primary strength of the Peters projection lies in its accurate representation of the relative areas of landmasses. This makes it particularly useful for depicting global distributions of population, resources, or environmental phenomena where accurate area comparisons are crucial. For example, illustrating global poverty distribution using the Peters projection offers a more accurate reflection of the affected land areas than a Mercator projection, avoiding the visual misrepresentation of the size of less developed countries. This characteristic makes it a powerful tool for promoting a more equitable and accurate global perspective.

IV. Weaknesses and Criticisms of the Peters Projection: Shape Distortion

Despite its accurate area representation, the Peters projection is not without its drawbacks. Its most significant criticism lies in its distortion of shape. While areas are accurately represented, the shapes of continents and countries, particularly those at higher latitudes, are noticeably elongated. For example, countries near the poles appear significantly stretched and distorted compared to their actual shape. This shape distortion can be problematic for applications where accurate shape representation is paramount, such as navigational purposes. The trade-off between area accuracy and shape fidelity is a central debate in cartography, and the Peters projection highlights this inherent tension.

V. Historical Context and Controversy: A Challenge to Traditional Cartography

The Peters projection's creation and subsequent promotion were steeped in controversy. It was developed and championed by Arno Peters in the 1970s, who argued that the Mercator projection, with its inherent area distortion, perpetuated a Eurocentric view of the world, disproportionately emphasizing the size of European countries. His advocacy for the Peters projection was partly motivated by its potential to challenge this perceived bias and promote a more equitable global perspective. This sparked significant debate within the cartographic community, with some praising its fairness, and others criticizing its shape distortion.

VI. Applications of the Peters Projection: Where it Excels

Despite its shape distortion, the Peters projection finds application in several areas where accurate area representation is prioritized over shape accuracy. These include: Demographic studies: Mapping population density, distribution of diseases, and other population-related data. Resource management: Illustrating the distribution of natural resources, such as minerals, forests, or water resources. Environmental studies: Depicting the impact of climate change, deforestation, or pollution across different regions. Educational materials: Teaching geography and promoting a more geographically balanced perspective on the world.

VII. Summary: A Powerful Tool with Limitations

The Peters projection offers a powerful alternative to projections like the Mercator, prioritizing equal area representation over accurate shape depiction. While its shape distortion limits its application in certain fields, its accurate portrayal of relative land areas makes it a valuable tool for illustrating global patterns and promoting a more geographically balanced perspective. The controversy surrounding its adoption highlights the inherent biases that can be embedded within cartographic representations and the importance of critically evaluating map projections based on their specific applications.

VIII. Frequently Asked Questions (FAQs):

1. What is the main difference between the Peters and Mercator projections? The Mercator projection preserves shape but distorts area, while the Peters projection preserves area but distorts shape. 2. Is the Peters projection suitable for navigation? No, the shape distortion in the Peters projection makes it unsuitable for navigation. The Mercator projection is much better suited for this purpose. 3. Why was the Peters projection controversial? It challenged the dominance of the Mercator projection, which was seen by some as perpetuating a Eurocentric view of the world due to its area distortion. 4. What types of maps benefit from the Peters projection? Maps illustrating global distributions of population, resources, environmental data, or other phenomena where accurate area representation is crucial. 5. Are there other equal-area projections? Yes, several other equal-area projections exist, each with its own strengths and weaknesses regarding shape distortion and other properties. Examples include the Mollweide projection and the Albers equal-area conic
